PART 1: BACKGROUND TO CLAIMING ASYLUM IN THE UK

Put yourself in the shoes of an asylum seeker and imagine...

- Fleeing civil war, persecution, trafficking, sexual violence, detention and even torture.
- Crossing the desert with other desperate people but insufficient food or water.
- Crossing the sea in overcrowded, unstable, leaking boats, under coaches, in refrigerated lorries or deep inside dark, airless containers.
- Dealing with people smugglers and giving up your savings to ensure some kind of passage however unsafe.
- Sleeping rough in Europe and being moved on by hostile border guards.
- Arriving in an alien and often unwelcoming culture with nothing but the clothes on your back.
- Coming to terms with separation and the loss of family.
- Acclimatising to a new language and negotiating new customs as you try to rebuild your life without family or friends to support you.
- Finding yourself living on £5 a day in substandard shared accommodation, not being allowed to work and with no access to English classes.
- Having insufficient funds to travel into the city, no social contacts beyond your own community in exile and no resources beyond Facebook.
- Being confronted with racism and xenophobia when you venture out, leaving you feeling unwelcome, marginalised and socially isolated.

Outside of their own communities, refugees mostly meet with authority figures in an official capacity – lawyers, police, immigration officers, doctors, social workers, therapists – where power relations are imbalanced and not in their favour. Few will have met any British people informally or anyone who treats them as an equal or as a friend.

Seeking asylum is a laborious, de-humanising process that can take years of representations, rejections and appeals. Asylum seekers usually live in hostels or private rented accommodation, have very little money (asylum seekers receive approx. £35 a week) and are not allowed to work. Where possible they study at College and attend ESOL (English for Speakers of Other Languages) classes although this is now being limited to people with refugee status and on Job Seekers Allowance.

Despite this, many asylum seekers are resilient, resourceful and manage to remain hopeful. They can feel fortunate that they have a chance to rebuild their lives in the UK. But in the interim their lives can be quite chaotic – responding to last minute summons from the Home Office, collecting their benefit in person, attending appointments or moving house at short notice. Fearful of doing anything wrong or getting into trouble with the authorities, their lives can rotate around the demands of bureaucracy and the challenges of living from hand to mouth. For some, years of insecurity waiting for their asylum to be resolved can be accompanied by depression, insomnia and lack of self-worth. For many it has been a long time since they have been able to exercise much personal agency in their lives, relax or enjoy simple pleasures.

Through befriending you can help to restore normality to lives badly disrupted by forced migration. Building trusting relationships with friendly neighbours can be the first step towards creating a safe space that asylum seekers and refugees can call home.

PART 2: THE BEFRIENDING RELATIONSHIP

What is refugee befriending?

Befriending is a chance to reach out as willing volunteers to offer supportive, social relationships with marginalised refugees, asylum seekers and migrants who may be finding it difficult to form friendships in the community. By providing an introduction, HostNation hopes to accelerate trusting friendships, which can help build confidence and participation amongst those seeking refuge in our communities. To 'befriend' means to act as a friend and 'to favour' an individual. It is different to a friendship in as much as befriending is a service and a commitment in time, but it can always grow into a mutual and personal friendship.

So many refugees scarcely know anyone outside their caseworkers, other asylum seekers and their own ethnic community. One-to-one befriending relationships with local residents not only help to reduce the social isolation that refugees experience, but can increase their self confidence, promote their independence, broaden their social networks and help them to integrate into community life. A chance to have a simple walk in the park or a chat over a cup of tea with a friendly person can bring a sense of normality to someone whose life has been turned upside down. And, it is often a highly rewarding and worthwhile experience for the befriender as well.

Befriending relationships are not only between men and women and inter-cultural but often inter-generational as well. Parents, whose children have flown the nest, often relate to their refugee friends as extended family and have in the past described their role as 'in loco parentis', or in some cases where their refugee friend has children, as 'in loco grand-parentis'. Refugees in turn refer to befrienders as 'mum', 'auntie' or 'uncle' (watch the befriending film). These kinds of relationships can be very beneficial for refugees who have lost or left behind their own families or young refugees who may need parental figures to support them in the transition to adulthood. The presence of a trusted and involved older adult can help build their confidence and enable them to look towards the future. However HostNation seeks to have a wide and diverse range of befrienders, both young (over 18) and older, and in the case of younger befrienders we will generally try to match them with refugees of a similar age.

How does it work?

We have a growing database of volunteer befrienders, recruited from the community at large or from refugee support groups, human rights charities, faith and civil society organisations, living in or near cities with asylum seeker and refugee populations. We aim to recruit a broad range of befrienders from a wide variety of backgrounds, all of whom have the capacity to build a trusting relationship and stay with it. We do, however, focus on long-term British residents on the grounds that these connections can be the hardest to make and need some facilitation whilst refugees often have existing contact with refugee groups and their own ethnic community.

Everyone registers with us and goes through a simple but important process of screening and profiling before being briefed and added to our pool of befrienders who are 'ready to go'. We then match you via our contact network of local refugee service providers and caseworkers who will refer socially isolated service users they feel would benefit from having a local friend.

The process starts with the asylum seeker or refugee. HostNation seeks to find them a good match with someone who has both the time and the inclination to be supportive and welcoming. The key criterion will, however, be geography, as friendships are most likely to be sustainable if you live near one another. Profile information will then be used to further refine the match, for example gender, interests, language skills and so on. HostNation will contact both parties to put them in touch and the referrer (the caseworker of the organisation who referred the refugee) will broker the initial face-to-face meeting.

HostNation is primarily about introductions. We do our best to ensure a successful match and arrange the first meeting, after this further meet-ups are arranged directly between yourselves. HostNation will check how the relationship is going after one month and then again at three months, by talking to both the referrer/befriendee and the befriender.

The initial commitment is for three months, with the aim of meeting your befriendee once or twice a fortnight. After three months the initial commitment is over, but ideally, shared experiences will have occurred and new social relations forged. Continued contact, support and friendship after this first stage are up to the individuals involved. If other schemes are any prediction of success, some remain friends for life.

What is expected of a befriender?

This is an altruistic, social arrangement and there is no payment or professional service provided. In many ways it can be easier to give money to charity but to give of yourself, in order to make a real difference to one person's life, can be so much more rewarding.

Once introduced, befrienders should try and keep in regular (weekly) phone contact with their refugee friend, and arrange, by call or by text, to spend a few hours together every week if possible, but at least fortnightly.

Befrienders are there to help take their friend's mind off everyday problems by providing opportunities to have fun and to put a smile back on their face. Their role is to provide companionship as well as moral support as refugees adjust to life in the UK. Befrienders try to create a sense of belonging and help their friend to build a happier future life. As one befriender put it: "I see my role not only as a willing playmate but also as emotional and practical supporter to my friend."

Volunteer befrienders need to have time, motivation and energy to give in order to create what can be a special and unique relationship. There is likely to be less common ground than a normal friendship and there is often a language barrier as well as a wide cultural divide to bridge. It requires both time and effort – patience, flexibility, understanding, mutual trust and respect. HostNation is founded on the belief that both sides want to try and make the befriending relationship work.

What is not expected of a befriender

The emphasis for the befriender is on emotional rather than practical support. Rather than being 'helped' and becoming dependant on help, befriending should be about helping them to socialise and becoming more independent. Refugees typically face many intractable problems – from the immigration process to claiming welfare rights to accessing education, employment and healthcare – and it would be overwhelming to feel responsibility for resolving these complex problems. The asylum process is hard to navigate without expert knowledge and it can be counter-productive for befrienders to advise asylum seekers however well meaning. Clear boundaries between different people working with a refugee or asylum seeker are essential in order for them to have a good understanding of who they should go to for different things. Council workers, Citizen's Advice Bureaus, refugee service providers, social workers and lawyers are out there to provide advice and specialist guidance and time spent with a befriender is often a moment for refugees to switch off from these concerns.

Having said that, we know that it can be hard for a befriender to do nothing if their friend is trying to deal with a deportation threat or a housing eviction; in these situations you may be able to help your friend find ways to access expert support and the service itself may need a friendly nudge to provide the support required. If the original referral has been made by a case-worker then the befrienders should have their contact details and be able to discuss the help required.

There are also a number of online refugee service directories that are searchable by location. Some are more up to date and comprehensive than others so it is worth cross-referencing them. This can help you and your friend to identify local services that may be able to help them further:

The Refugee Aid App is one, the Refugee Council has an online directory, Refsource is another online service as well as Refugee Maps and City of Sanctuary has started mapping refugee services by area, here is a link to their Birmingham map and there is always the Government Asylum Helpline for support.

If a high level of trust is built between befriender and refugee, befrienders may be asked by their friend to accompany them to a Home Office meeting, a hospital appointment or a court hearing, not in any legal or clinical capacity, but rather to provide their friend with all-important moral support. If asked to provide a written character reference or to outline their relationship to support an asylum claim, then this should only be done in close consultation with their friend's legal representative.

Practicalities on meeting

Arrange to meet somewhere central and easy to access by public transport. Be aware of the practicalities for someone who doesn't know their way around as well as you. Depending on how long they have been in the city they might not know the key places they need to go to and it can be really hard to learn to use a public transport system. Do you buy the ticket on the bus or in a shop? Do you get a day ticket or a return? And that's before you get to timetables or planning more complex journeys.

It helps not only to suggest a time to meet but also the best transport route from where they live (buses are cheapest). Initially it may be worth meeting in a public place near their home address and then travel into the city together. Make sure that mobile telephone numbers are exchanged. Asylum seekers and refugees rarely choose to let their befriender down, but like all of us they may oversleep, get the wrong bus or underestimate the length of the journey. Sometimes they may simply have run out of credit on their phone or travel card and can't contact you or afford to travel. It can be a good idea to call or send a text before you leave home to see if they're on their way.

Ideas for what to do

Ask them when you first meet what they would like to do. Maybe draw up a loose plan of activities and places to visit together. Show them something of your town or city and its history; visit the local museum, library, art gallery, cathedral, sports centre or other places of interest, especially ones that are free. Take them for a walk in the park or to a football match or on a bike ride. Bear their financial circumstances in mind when suggesting activities. Shopping is often too expensive to be a pastime, but showing your contact how to source donations or find bargains in charity and pound shops or via local recycle schemes can be helpful. Mobile phones are a lifeline to their community and families back home, so try to show them where they can access free Wi-Fi and internet.

Some may want help with learning to use a computer or with English language coursework or to find a college course or to register with a GP or to open a bank account as these things can be hard to do when you're on your own with limited ID. A supportive befriender can also help refugees to access community classes or to apply for vocational training or to volunteer in the community. But try to maintain a healthy balance between doing fun things together and helping to develop skills or battle officialdom.

Few refugees have seen anything of the British countryside so a day trip can be a welcome break. If the coast is not too far from you, consider an outing to the seaside as refugees from landlocked countries may never have seen the sea, except under adverse circumstances during their long journeys to the UK. Try to introduce them to local community groups and include refugee friends in social events, especially if they are typically British – gatherings such as barbecues, festivals and summer fairs are popular. Photos of their new friends and new experiences that they can show to others or share on Facebook can also give pleasure. Capturing your friend laughing is the best possible evidence of your positive impact.

Above all else befrienders are there to make their friends feel welcome and valued as human beings. Having someone show a genuine interest in them and their welfare and being able to share simple pleasures together – talking, listening, walking, sharing a meal, feeling part of a family or group of friends, being invited to a British home – can be the most inclusive and meaningful experiences. Many migrants are alone and being able to talk to ordinary people who treat them as equals – something most of us take for granted – can be highly beneficial.

Possible difficulties

Firstly, bear in mind that it can be complex to make plans with an asylum seeker or refugee. Please be patient.

This is not necessarily because they are reluctant to meet but because their time is rarely their own. Claiming asylum makes many demands on an individual and their lives are full of upheavals that are hard to foresee. They may receive notice of a court hearing or be asked to quit their accommodation at short notice. They fall ill or may simply be too anxious about their future to make nice plans for an outing.

It is important to realise that your friend's life can be chaotic, and sometimes their self-esteem can be low. Try to be sympathetic and flexible. If a plan falls through tell them not to worry and help them to make another. Persistence and encouragement pay off in the end.

Any absences for a short break away (especially for asylum seekers) should be planned ahead and cleared with their caseworker or solicitor. It is important to establish that there are no crucial events scheduled to take place during the absence. This could be an appeal, a legal deadline, a Home Office reporting obligation or a Job Centre appointment. Travel restrictions should also be checked as most asylum seekers, (and some refugees), may not be able to leave or re-enter the country due to their immigration status and the documents they hold.

They may also be overwhelmed by information overload and have difficulty with small things that we take for granted such as rubbish collections, what goes in which bin and what goes down the drain, using a self-scanning till, understanding postcodes or how to post a document. They will really benefit from kindness and patience and maybe the odd friendly conversation to point them in the right direction when it's needed.

Important boundaries

Whilst every case is different, it is generally inadvisable to try to house, financially support or directly employ an asylum seeker. The relationship with a befriender is primarily social and between equals, we discourage dependency or any arrangements that could lead to an imbalance in power relations. As we've said, asylum seekers and refugees are best supported in ways that empower them and foster independence.

So do be aware that intervention in your friend's practical circumstances, even with the best intentions, can have unforeseen consequences. The offer of regular financial assistance or temporary accommodation can impact on legal aid, welfare benefits or statutory housing provision. Even short absences from National Asylum Support Services (NASS) housing can result in restrictions, re-prioritising and in some cases, homelessness. Depending on their immigration status it could be illegal for them to work, and in such cases this will impact on their asylum case and welfare eligibility. However once someone has leave to remain introductions to local people or opportunities that might help them to be more independent can be very helpful. Breaking Barriers helps refugees with employment prospects in the London area and TERN (The Entrepreneurial Refugee Network) helps those with refugee status start their own business and there are other organisations that can help mentor refugees, write CVs and help them prepare for interviews.

Paying for things

Whilst financial dependency is discouraged, if you feel able to help out with travel fares or paying for coffee or topping up their mobile, then it can enable you both to get more out of your time together. HostNation does not have the resources to reimburse expenses incurred as a result of befriending, so this is at your discretion.

There are lots of activities that are free, but even the bus fare to meet you can be an obstacle for asylum seekers who may be living on £5 a day. In London most asylum seekers are dispersed to the outer zones and the cost of travel into central London can be twice their daily allowance so they often stay in their room because they cannot afford to go out. Unlike asylum seekers refugees can work but they may be on zero hour contracts or job seekers' allowance, so there can still be considerable financial hardship.

If you do intend to treat them to a meal or a movie, mention this when making the arrangement, so that they are not feeling anxious about expenses beforehand. If asylum seekers or refugees fear that meeting their befriender is a luxury that they cannot afford, they will start to look for excuses not to come.

There is a fine line between offering and funding hospitality and making someone feel indebted. We do not advise large cash gifts (over £100) or regular financial transfers because, apart from the consequences outlined above, these are not sustainable and could cause anxiety and a sense of obligation. But small gifts or cards at appropriate times can be a nice way of showing that you care and your friend may also wish to exchange gifts with you as a sign of appreciation or cook you a meal.

Home visits

Many refugees and asylums have never been invited into a British home. Meeting your family and visiting your home will be an important marker of friendship but we advise against issuing an invitation in the first instance. Start by meeting in the town or city as you are welcoming them to your home in the wider sense (home town or city). Inviting them into your actual home is a more familiar step and better taken when you feel that a personal bond is developing between you and your friend. It is worth trying to maintain a good balance between home and activity-based befriending.

If a refugee or asylum seeker lives in accommodation that they consider to be home, they may invite you to visit them. This can be a matter of pride and a way of thanking their befriender for their hospitality. If possible, do accept such invitations even if it means travelling to an unfamiliar part of the city. If, on the other hand, an invitation is not forthcoming, don't take it personally. Many asylum seekers and refugees live in sub-standard accommodation or shared hostels. Remember, they may have been accustomed to a far better standard of living in their home country before the trauma that led them to seek asylum here, and may feel unwilling to reveal their difficult circumstances.

Communicating

We always try to ascertain an asylum seeker or refugee's level of English before making a match, so that we can brief you. However the first time you meet them they may appear quiet and diffident. Often their English is better than it may seem as they may be nervous at first. People seeking asylum have had their trust badly abused in the past and may have some difficulty trusting strangers once more. Try to reserve judgment on the first meeting. A frightened soul may blossom into a lively personality full of hope and aspiration. A friendly smile and a 'Hello' can go a long way to relieving any fear and help to make them feel welcome and wanted.

We ask that all asylum seekers and refugees referred speak reasonable English, it is hard to befriend someone with very limited English. Some will have perfect English and may even have studied university courses in English, others may have enough to get by but need help with the odd word or two, whilst others might not even be literate in their own language. Most asylum seekers and refugees are very keen to improve their English skills as they know that this is key to rebuilding their lives in Britain. When refugee students at an English conversation class were recently asked to come up with ways of improving their English, the first thing they said was 'make a British friend'. An opportunity to practice their English informally is one of the great benefits of this scheme. You can also help your friend access English / ESOL classes in their area to learn English (or websites that make learning fun). ESOL classes are generally for refugees, not asylum seekers, but a number of charitable support groups try to complement this provision by offering free classes.

If their own language does not use the Roman alphabet, like Arabic or Hindi, they may have especial difficulty reading and writing English. If you are having trouble communicating it may be worth sharing the Google Translate App, which can also be the source of some amusement! We do ask befrienders if they have any language skills and where possible we will try to match Arabic speakers or French speakers with one another.

Cultural sensitivities

For the introductory meeting it is very important that you do your best to put your befriender at ease. As mentioned earlier they may well be nervous and anxious about meeting someone new. Just beware of not saying anything or dressing in a way that could make them feel uncomfortable. Dress respectfully and speak slowly and carefully. It is worth stressing at the outset that you are a local citizen and that you want to welcome them to the area, show them around and help them to settle happily.

Once you know the country of origin and culture of your friend, it's a good idea to look up a bit about their country's history, religious customs etc. Being culturally aware shows your interest and can be a good topic of conversation. Refugees often like to talk about cultural differences between Britain and 'back home'. Different food traditions as well as attitudes can be the subject of much curiosity (and humour). If they are Muslim they are likely to prefer halal meat and may not drink alcohol, but don't make assumptions, always check to see what they are comfortable with. They may not be used to having pets, especially dogs, in the home, so be aware and introduce your pet gently.

Don't forget that your friend may be just as well educated as you, and may have run their own business or been politically active in their home countries. At the same time, they may also come from more conservative cultures than our own, with different gender roles than we are used to and perhaps a more disciplinarian approach to raising children. It may sometimes be hard, but try to deal with different value systems sensitively and reserve judgment. Refugees have left so much behind that it is natural for them to try to uphold their own culture. But don't shy away from discussing differences in attitudes, as this can help them to understand British values and beliefs such as gender and sexual equality, religious tolerance, freedom of expression and so on.

The role of befriending may involve some form of cultural mediation and orientation. It is a good form of cultural exchange and well handled it can help to bridge differences and lead to greater cultural understanding and appreciation of diversity on both sides. HostNation has been told about asylum seekers from non-Christian faiths who have been delighted (and surprised) to be welcomed into a Christian church and women refugees who have been fascinated to learn about the suffragettes. Befriending is a two-way process and as with all friendships, sharing experiences and showing respect for one another is key.

Don't expect to understand everything about your friend's situation, past or present. HostNation will brief you with what we know but often, due to confidentiality, referrers only provide minimal information. Most refugees have suffered badly at the hands of others, whether from their government, the military, rebel forces, police, people smugglers or traffickers. They may feel shame as well as trauma, so avoid any questioning that may feel like interrogation to them. They will have been asked to tell their 'story' many times and it can be a relief to spend time with people where they can live in the present and talk about future aspirations rather than be defined by their past. If your friend wants to tell you what happened, they will. If they don't, go gently, be as open and understanding as possible, and always be guided by them.

Safeguarding

At HostNation our aim is to match and introduce informed adults who will take responsibility for their friendship. We do not take minors (under 18) or people with substance abuse issues as befrienders or refugee referrals and we also advise strongly against referring the highly vulnerable or those with mental health problems.

As befrienders will not have unsupervised access to children or those with serious mental health issues, we do not ask for a DBS-check specifically to join HostNation. However we do recognise that whilst asylum seekers and refugees over 18 are not technically classified as 'vulnerable adults' many of them are nevertheless vulnerable. They may have suffered physical or mental abuse, grown up in a frightening environment (civil war, genocide) or witnessed the ill treatment of others. Many will have travelled here alone and been through dislocation, loss, flight and war. They will have lost things we take for granted such as their inner family world and the wider world of community, friends and an extended family network. The UK asylum-seeking process is also a dehumanising experience and throws up a whole host of new problems just when they thought they had reached safety. So whilst many refugees are resilient and resourceful and we want to treat them as people first rather than vulnerable victims, it is important that HostNation does everything possible to ensure that they are matched with kind and sympathetic befrienders.

For this reason our befrienders are carefully screened and checked; we ask for two references, passport ID and a photo. Befrienders fill in a detailed screening and profiling questionnaire and HostNation telephones each applicant to discuss the role and ensure suitability. The applicant commits to watch videos and training that we post online and to read this befriending guide. Many of our befrienders are recruited from refugee support networks, come from caring professions or have a background of community volunteering and so may already have a DBS (criminal record check) that we also record on the database.

It is less easy to provide checks on asylum seekers and refugees. For this reason we do not seek self-referral and always ask for someone who can vouch for them. We rely on the information provided by referrers and have strict criteria for referral. We ask for as much background and health information as possible, so that we can give befrienders a profile before their first meeting, but confidentiality is critical to any disclosure of information of this nature, which is why we ask both parties to provide their consent to information being shared between both parties. It is also important that befrienders do not share any personal information that their friends may disclose during the befriending process with any third parties without their consent.

In our experience asylum seekers and refugees are generally very law abiding, as they do not want to do anything that may hinder their case or jeopardise their chance of being offered asylum. In many cases they are the victims of religious extremism or authoritarian regimes themselves and simply want to be accepted as fellow humans and to be able to live their lives in peace.

However if you have any concerns about the safety of your friend or of others then you should notify the emergency services immediately.

What happens next?

HostNation tries to manage expectations through the referral process and refugees are made aware that the commitment to befriend is for only for the first 3 months. After three months it is up to you and your friend to decide whether or not to continue to meet or maintain phone contact. The duration of each relationship will vary and depends on individual preference and chemistry – some will be supportive for a limited period; others may flower into a long-term friendship. Either way it will have been a worthwhile venture and there is no right or wrong outcome so long as any closure is mutual and managed sensitively.

HostNation will contact the befriender at the end of three months to determine the status of the relationship and to advise on ways to end it, if that is the preferred option. We will also seek evaluation of the experience from all parties and ask you whether you might be available for a new befriending relationship at a later date.

What if things don't work out?

With the best will in the world, not all relationships take off. Most befriender / befriendee experiences are very positive for both parties, but we cannot guarantee a successful outcome. A befriendee may be lacking in confidence or feeling low in spirits if they have had an asylum setback. Plans may be made and confirmed yet when the time comes there is a no-show, their phone is off and they don't respond. This does happen. If it happens once or twice, try to be understanding and don't give up. If it happens repeatedly and all friendly overtures receive no response, we recommend contacting the refugee's original referrer. They may be able to find out if your friend is OK and to try to understand the reasons for their lack of response. Sometimes, due to setbacks and fear of deportation, an asylum seeker may drop out of the formal asylum-seeking process and go 'underground'. This is technically illegal and it would be bad practice to collude with any such plans, but it could explain loss of contact.

If it becomes impossible to maintain contact over 3 months, do let us know as we hope that you may be prepared to try again by befriending someone else. Equally if you feel uncomfortable with your befriendee or find their behaviour inappropriate or their expectations excessive after initial meetings, you may feel the need to pull the plug. In this case contact their referrer and explain the situation and let us know so that we can help you to handle detachment sensitively.

PART 3: APPENDIX

Background information

Terms used:

Asylum seeker

- flees their homeland
- arrives in another country, whichever way they can
- makes themselves known to the authorities
- submits an asylum application
- has a legal right to stay in the country while awaiting a decision.

Refugee

- has proven to the authorities that they would be at risk if returned to their home country
- has had their claim for asylum accepted by the government
- can now stay here either long-term or indefinitely.

Refused asylum seeker

- has been unable to prove that they would face persecution back home
- has been denied protection by the authorities
- must now leave the country, unless they wish to appeal the decision or there are legitimate reasons why they cannot yet return home.

Economic migrant

- has moved to this country to work
- could be legally or illegally resident, depending on how they entered the country
- may or may not have a legal work permit.

The asylum seeking process

To be granted asylum or refugee status a person must be able to show that they are unable to return to their country of origin due to 'a well-founded fear of persecution for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion' (UN Refugee Convention 1951). This includes persecution for following a particular faith, belonging to an ethnic minority or for reasons of gender or sexuality.

Initial asylum application can be made at the point of entry or at asylum screening units around the country. Screening involves fingerprinting, photographing and an interview about the reasons and circumstances of travel to the UK. Fingerprints are then compared with a European database and a match can lead to the application being treated as a 'third party case' and the asylum seeker can, under the Dublin accord, be detained and face deportation to the country where they were first fingerprinted. They will then need a qualified and registered legal representative funded by legal aid to advise and represent them. With this lawyer the asylum seeker prepares a statement detailing their experiences that are the basis for the claim.

This needs to be returned to the UK Border Agency within 20 working days. They will then be interviewed about the substance of their claim. A decision will be taken by the UK Border Agency (part of the Home Office).

Positive decision:

They will be granted 30 months or five years 'Leave to Remain' and Refugee status or Humanitarian Protection both of which give them most of the rights of British citizens: to work, to study, to claim benefits. If they are granted refugee status they have the right to apply for an integration loan from UKBA as well as Convention Status Travel Documents (which allow them to travel anywhere apart from the country which they have fled and where they fear persecution). They can apply for 'Indefinite Leave to Remain' just before their original leave expires. If they are granted 'Indefinite Leave to Remain' they can apply for naturalisation as a British citizen. A minority of asylum seekers in the UK are granted Refugee status at this initial decision stage. Many face years of uncertainty in relation to their prospects of being able to remain in the UK.

Negative decision:

They may have a right to appeal the decision if they have discretionary leave to remain for more than one year however if they come from a country considered 'safe' by UKBA they will not be able to appeal the decision from within the UK. If they have the right to appeal they have less than 10 working days to submit their appeal, legal advisors will only continue to support them if they believe their appeal has a chance of succeeding in court.

Asylum appeals are decided by immigration judges at the Asylum and Immigration Tribunal (i.e. in court). The asylum seeker will be expected to attend along with their legal representative and will be offered interpreting services. If their appeal is successful they should be granted refugee status or humanitarian protection, however the UKBA can challenge the court's decision in the 'Upper Tribunal'. If their appeal is unsuccessful their legal representative can also challenge the decision in the Upper Tribunal but only on the basis that the decision is based on an 'error in law'.

During this process they can apply to have their discretionary leave to remain extended but when this expires and they have been unsuccessful in appealing their asylum decision it may be decided that their appeal rights are 'exhausted'. At this point they may become 'unlawfully in the UK' and told that they must leave. They will be informed of Assisted Voluntary Return (run by charities to provide some support for return to countries of origin) or they may be served with 'removal' directions and be detained whilst the UKBA makes deportation arrangements to remove them from the UK.

Alternatively they may choose to submit a fresh claim. The asylum process is complex to navigate and anyone advising on asylum matters needs to be qualified in immigration law.

Asylum support

The level of financial and housing support an individual receives is dependent on immigration status. Asylum seekers have 'asylum support' (sometimes referred to as NASS) and the right to housing – a flat, a hostel or bed and breakfast – but they cannot choose where they live and do not have the right to work. They are often dispersed away from London and the SE. They currently get £36.95 per week in financial support that they can claim from the Post Office on a weekly basis. If they've been refused asylum and are appealing then they get £35.39 per week credit on an Azure card or as vouchers for food, clothing and toiletries but only if they accept NASS housing. A mother with a child under 3 can claim an extra £3-5 per week. Asylum seekers get access to healthcare through the NHS and children between 5-17 will be offered a place at state school.

Only once they receive refugee status or humanitarian protection are they entitled to seek work and receive benefits such as Job Seeker's Allowance, housing benefit and local authority housing like other British residents. Housing could include supported housing; a tenancy in private rented accommodation or local authority accommodation but there is no automatic right to a council flat.

Often the joy at being offered leave to remain (refugee status) can quickly turn sour when an asylum seeker is given 28 days to move out of NASS accommodation and apply for housing benefit and Job Seeker's Allowance. Support transfers from the Home Office – who provide asylum accommodation and vouchers – to the Department of Work and Pensions. They are given 28 days to be issued with a Biometric Residence Permit by the Home Office, to find new housing through the local authority and to sign on for welfare benefits. If there are delays they will be evicted and some of those with newly granted refugee status can find themselves homeless and destitute in the period immediately following a successful asylum claim. The national asylum support system stops abruptly when an asylum seeker wins their right to remain and the transition to the rights of a UK resident with access to welfare can be very hard to navigate.

Asylum seekers who arrived as unaccompanied children (under 18) may have a different support system. When they arrived they would have been supported by social services under The Children's Act of 1989 and may have been fostered, placed in a children's home or supported by a keyworker in semi-independent accommodation. After the age of 18 they would be entitled to on going support under the Children (Leaving Care) Act of 2000 until they are 21, unless they are in an agreed programme of full-time education in which case they can be supported until 25 (or the programme ends). Young care leavers have the right to a Personal Advisor (usually a social worker) to support them and their educational choices and a Pathway Plan which is drawn up by social services, planned with the young person and regularly reviewed to provide guidance on the support they might need until 21. An asylum seeker with the right qualifications can, in theory, go to university; but unless they have Refugee status or Humanitarian Protection Status and have been in the UK for at least 3 yrs., it is unlikely that they will be treated as a 'home student' or will be eligible for student finance funding. If they have refugee status they have the same rights to further education as a British citizen.

How many asylum seekers in Britain?

The UK's annual level of asylum applications is around 35-36,000, which has dropped from a much higher figure of 85,000 in 2002 (this was before new border controls and restrictions on appeals from certain countries led to a downfall). The main countries that asylum seekers have fled are Syria, Afghanistan, Somalia, Sudan, Southern Sudan and Eritrea.

Despite a prevailing notion that all asylum seekers want to come to Britain, we are in fact 20th in Europe for the number of asylum applications per population. Topping the league table is Germany followed by Malta and Greece. The UK granted 38% of these applications first time around, which rises to 49% on appeal but with leave to remain shrinking to 30 months on average and fees increasing for each stage of the application and appeals process, it is fast becoming not only a highly bureaucratic but a very costly process.

The number of asylum seekers and refugees (i.e. those given Leave to Remain) in the UK is estimated at approx. 150,000, making asylum seekers and refugees only 0.2% of the population. Refugees have a legal right, under UK and international law, to bring their families over to the UK to join them. Approximately 16,000 refused asylum seekers who have been unable to prove that they would be at risk of persecution if returned to their home country, are deported each year. The main countries for deportation are India, Pakistan, China, Afghanistan, Nigeria and Brazil.
